POLITICAL APPROACH

Abstract

For contemporary as for historians, Tudor Vladimirescu proved a historic personality hardly covered in patterns, but also had to explain a particular course of Romanian history, to open a “threshold age” and structural changes in romanian society. Political thought in the Romanian principalities in the Revolution of 1821 was driven by practical goals, think in terms of power, in a society assume that legitimate hierarchical organization and was distinguished by its own privileges. Moreover, in 1821, power was pivot element around which the facts have become an end, one way, at least to a point, one in which, once lost power, former combatants began to exculpate, to justify and claim a certain political order of the court that they were superior (Russia, Turkey, Austria).
